

Telophase Corporation Announces the Award of the NASA Educational and Public Outreach (EPO) Recruitment Prototype

Arlington, VA – September 29, 2008

Telophase Corporation, a leading 8(a) systems integrator for the federal government, announced today that it was awarded the development of a prototype to support new requirements for the EPO's intern recruitment program. The award was a direct sole source.

Telophase Corporation is providing services that will consist of web-based application that will support new interfaces, functions and be used on new requirements. Telophase will employ a hybridized software development methodology approaches for prototyping the NASA EPO's internship processes. This combined methodology will allow Telophase to develop a re-usable prototype application that can evolve into the eventual deployed solution for the NASA EPO.

Telophase's support will include the following: Project Management, Requirement Gathering, Workflow Process, Testing and Development.

"NASA's, in particular the Department of Education, is one of our most valued customer. We want to provide NASA with a prototype that will fulfill its requirement for the 2009 iteration and perhaps guide them into building a more robust application for 2010", Jamil Husain, President and CEO.

About NASA Education and Public Outreach

NASA grantees provide hundreds of programs, activities, events, and resources. Award-winning educational web sites, major exhibitions in museums and science centers, partnerships with minority universities, research projects that allow students and teachers to participate in NASA missions, live webcasts, and public television broadcasts on major science research areas are just a few of the opportunities available.

The success of this program depends, in part, on the scientists and engineers who conduct research for NASA. There are many avenues for participation by scientists and for such contributions to be recognized and acknowledged.
